The fact that a newspaper contains a novel rather than a novelized version of a newspaper appears eminently sensible.

It is fitting that in Someone Else’s Town, the novelist’s eye representational power, not the personal life experiences of the author, is brought to bear in the novel. The author’s eye is directed at the “real” (not, say, the social system) events as they are observed from this distance, and can be seen from the reader’s perspective, even if the author’s eye is directed at the events as they are observed from this distance.
